Instead, he hand in mind a more comprehensive, organic approach: 6 And these words which I command you today shall be in your heart. You must express your values in everyday life (v. What is it that is important for you? You have to really think about what it is that you care about. What didn’t feel good? 8 You shall bind them as a sign on your hand, and they shall be as frontlets between your eyes. Drawing on over 30 years’ experience working with both Fortune 100 and small businesses, Lisa has distilled the essential ingredients for building long term business success in her new book, The Value of Core Values: Five Keys to Success through Values-Centered Leadership. You have to share examples of how your values have guided you and your decisions. If you don’t live by your values, or if you change your opinions about your values, it will create confusion, unproductivity, it will hinder trust and it can ruin relationships. Comment below and share your leadership values and how you’re going to use them going forward. How to action on your values A few key points to make is that your values should be visible. Your values, your guiding principles, your non-negotiables. They will guide how you show up as a leader. Knowing your values is not just some kind of fluff is actually really important. They’ve done some assessments and research, and they’ve shown that people and leaders who know their values and are connected to their values every day, feel more committed to their work. Where did you not? What felt good? Think about what you really care about. Before we go into leadership values. Who are you as a person – as a leader You have to connect to who you are and what you stand for. Ep005: How To Lead With Your Leadership Values Check out the podcast! Ready for more? Really allow them to find their own personal values that they truly believe in. In teaching values, I think it provides a four-pronged communications model: Your values must first be in your heart (v. Regardless, we only recommend products or services we use and believe will add value to our readers. You may get tired of thinking and talking about values. Where did you act within your values? 7 You shall teach them diligently to your children, and shall talk of them when you sit in your house, when you walk by the way, when you lie down, and when you rise up. Have you ever thought about who you are as a leader? What’s your leadership brand, your leadership identity? How are you making certain decisions and why based on your values, and that will help them see how they can do the same, coach them in this process. So that’s a really good way for you to start to reflect on your values and gain more clarity by figuring out what it is that brought you frustration. Step 2: How can you use your values daily Once you know your values, start to reflect on how you can use them in your day-to-day work. Register for my monthly Lead Like YOU! This is where it all starts. You can find that under here. Values are taught—and caught—in the context of concrete situations. Your leadership identity is your leadership story, it’s your purpose, your vision and mission and it is your leadership values. Lisa Huetteman knows. So, as you know, the second step is to actively use your values every day. Do they work together really well? If you want to truly live by your values, you have to start to share your values, communicate, talk about your values, and help others understand why this is important to you. We’re going to talk about how you can lead with your leadership core values and also why it is important that we as leaders know our values and live by them. Outside of the media spotlight, thousands of companies struggle every day with expensive, time-consuming challenges with customers, employees, and vendors. 6). 9 You shall write them on the doorposts of your house and on your gates.” (Deuteronomy 6:6–9) While this is specifically talking about teaching God’s commandments to children, I think it is applicable to teaching anything valuable in any organizational context. You actually have to communicate about them. We are disclosing this in accordance with the Federal Trade Commission’s 16 CFR, Part 255: “Guides Concerning the Use of Endorsements and Testimonials in Advertising. Photo courtesy of ©iStockphoto.com/kycstudio Michael asked, How do you encourage others in your organization to communicate the core values?” In my last post, I emphasized the formal ways in which we communicate our values at Thomas Nelson. As leaders, we can’t let this happen. You have to share your values and you have to live by them. It’s one thing to sit in a conference room and talk theory. It helps build the crucial trust because if we show up to our values every day, the people that we lead will start to see us for our values. They will start to be able to predict how we are going to behave. Highlighting the difference between a marketing tag line based on words and core values that are truly integrated into the life of a business, Lisa draws upon the experiences of successful leaders and companies to show how living core values works in reality, and offers concrete steps to show readers what they can do to reap similar benefits. Just as in parenting, it is the informal, day-to-day situations we encounter that present the greatest opportunity for expressing our values and shaping our culture. You can’t pass on what you don’t possess. They are your moral judgments. You will give people a better insight into who you are, and that makes you a bit vulnerable because you’re not hiding. Given the daily challenges of running any organization, it is easy for values to get overlooked and even forgotten. It might feel a little bit difficult at the start, but you will see that over time, you will see the benefits from sharing your values openly, and that will outweigh this uncomfortable feeling at the start. And I would love for you to share your values. And on the opposite, start to reflect on situations of frustration or conflict and ask yourself which values were challenged. Often when we feel frustrated when we’re feeling anxious or in conflict with others, it’s most likely based on values and one of our values might actually be offended. Keeping them alive and passing them on is critical to enduring success. So, understand how does it compare and what does it mean for you and your behavior at work? By implementing the Five Keys described in this book, any business can become a values-centric organization where the leadership team drives a change in culture leading to sustainable and tangible success. It is too easy for others in our organization to lose perspective. Step 4: Build a value based culture This leads me into the fourth step, which is to build a value based culture. What our goals are. You’re actually sharing who you are, what you care about and why you care about that. What are you invested in? So it’s not enough to know your values. What’s their secret? so they will feel more committed to the work that they do. 8). This question is similar to the last one. As leaders, we must embrace the values for ourselves. (I sometimes do.) But as leaders, it is an essential part of our work. You can create a beautiful value based culture that is authentic. And in that guide, you will find a few steps to actually reflect on your values and define your top five leadership values. The benefits of knowing your values as a leader Knowing our values can promote ethical behavior. It can help us make decisions. This book challenges anyone leading a business to integrate key ideals into daily operations by using inspiring and practical case studies. 9). it will provide a common language and satisfaction And great leaders spend time to get to know the team members and to get to know their values. Question: How do you encourage the leaders in your organization to pass on your core values? What actions align with your values? How do you make sure you stay committed to hard work? So really ask yourself what are the actions you can do to make sure that you live your values every day. Reflect at the end of the day and see where you were maybe misaligned. This is especially true when you encounter conflict, adversity, or even defeat. What is it that you truly care about? You must be the standard bearer. How are you being courageous? Do they align? I now want to walk you through four steps to lead with your values. Step 1: Know your values Step number one is to actually know your values. And as a team, you will start to appreciate this beautiful diversity of values. More importantly, leaders can recognize and grow to appreciate that the greatest value of core values is ultimately in the values themselves. And then you have to show up to that every single day. He didn’t suggest classrooms, seminars, or conferences. And so we will be in an everyday conflict to live by the company values because that’s expected from you as a leader. How do you show others that courage is important to you? If one of your values is diversity, how do you actively drive diversity? In recent years, corporations deemed “too big to fail” failed miserably, and major banks, auto companies, and other giants needed government bailouts to survive. And then there are those companies that manage to thrive in good times and bad, have dedicated, happy employees, and legions of loyal customers. Final thoughts If this has sparked something within you, then I invite you to now take some time to reflect on your leadership values. What’s important to you? Step 3: Be prepared, be vulnerable The third important point is to be prepared, to be vulnerable. In the book of Exodus, when God gave His people the Law, He also told them how to teach it to their children. What did you care about at that moment? It is at least as old as Moses. What do you care about? Our job is to keep reminding them of our values and what is at stake if we don’t act in a way that is congruent with them. In their book, “The Leadership Challenge”, James Kouzes and Barry Posner define your values as the key principles that help you in every decision that you make. And because your values are so personal, by sharing your values, you will always give away something personal from you. Some decisions based on your values happen consciously and others subconsciously. Why are values important? Kouzes and Posner also have shown that it actually really matters. And then reflect on situations of success and start to see what values were present there for you in that moment. Start to question, how much am I living my values every day and then make some changes, take some actions to really live in your values. 7). You can download my guide and workbook here to get some help with this. In fact, he didn’t recommend a formal process at all. Help them to figure out what that is. They are your guide in how you invest and trust other people. Is there a little bit of an overlap? You must keep your values visible (v. You must live your values everywhere (v. And if you like this video, give me a thumbs up and I’m looking forward to seeing you soon. That’s nothing new, but did you know that it’s really important that you, as a leader or a small business owner, have your own leadership core values? So your people start to get to know you. And when it comes to values, we know that organizations, most big organizations have values. We gain more clarity of what we stand for and where we are going to go. In every context and in all situations. They feel like they can be true to themselves. Whether you are in the board room, on a client visit, or attending a trade show in another city, you must walk the talk and encourage your fellow leaders to do likewise. Then we must encourage the other leaders in our organization to embrace them as well. This is not a new idea. What is important to you. I have a question for you. They will be behind your decision-making process. Another important thing here, if you are part of an organization, is to understand how your values compare to the company values? And everyone actually is happy because they feel aligned to their values. So that way they can start to build relationships with us and build trust. But if they don’t align with your personal values, then you might be in conflict because you don’t quite know how you should act, how you should behave. Continuing in my series of “20 Leadership Questions,” we come to the eighth question that Michael Smith asked when he interviewed me. They apply close at home and far away. Encourage your team members to reflect on their values, share the exercise that you’ve done. Don’t tell them what to believe or what to value. All of these are important, but, as I suggested at the end of the post, they are probably not the most important. What are your non-negotiables? The personal values of a leader, drive your motivation and your passion, and therefore their drive, the energy that you put to the work that you do. Anything less will seem contrived or hypocritical if we don’t start here. By their very nature, values are transcendent. You’ll be able to see where there are some differences and what that actually means for you working together. If we want to lead with integrity and authenticity, we have to live by our values, by our true identity as leaders, we have to put down any mask and we have to start to live by who we really are and lead that way as well and show up to our brand every day. Because sometimes we might end up working for an organisation that has different values to ours. Lisa shows how companies that identify and explicitly define their core values, hire people who share them, and live them every day operate with a united vision and purpose that leads to exceptional performance and profitability. I talked about hiring practices, new employee orientation, rewards and recognition, and annual reviews. So if courage is one of your values, what are the courageous actions and steps you take every day? Values are the foundation of a healthy organization. Reflect on how you can use your values. They don’t have to second guess what mood we are in and what that could mean for our decisions or how we communicate that day. The team just know what’s important to us and what drives our decisions and our behaviors. They’re more effective as leaders, and they’re also way more productive in the work that they do.
